This monograph comprises a critical analysis of the set-up of the F.R. system, with particular reference to the problem of credit control. The author follows a summary of the events leading up to the establishment of the system with discussions of reserves and note issues, loans and rediscounts open-market operations, and international relations. His analysis demonstrates desirability of greater concentration of power over discount rates and open-market ops. than now exists in hands of the Bd. The author feels such powers are more important than the increased powers for direct pressure granted to By. by Banking Act of 1933. He feels that control over relations with foreign banks, granted by that Act, are not satisfactory and would be unnecessary if Bd. had necessary discount rate and open mkt. control.
