AGGER, E. E.

Prosperity through a reduction of the
rediscount rate, JOURNAL OF THE AMERICAN BANKERS ASSOCIATION,

June, 1924.

Analyzes the manner in which a reduction in rediscount rates may stimulate prosperity. Concludes that no very decided results have followed reductions by the N.Y. and Cleveland Federal Reserve Banks in May.

Since the establishment of the system the following changes in interest rates have occurred:

the spread between long and short maturities has decreased;

the spread between East and West has decreased;

seasonal fluctuations are less;

panic rates have disappeared.

It is the direct pressure of individual banks upon their borrowers and not the rate of interest, which largely serves to check the exuberance of business expansion. Changes in discount rates are important, however, as a signal that pressure is desirable.
