BANKERS MAGAZINE,

November, 1922.

Pp. 2.

In Detroit where there are 3 national banks without branches, 179 state branch banks are operated. The national banks are in an unfavorable position to compete with the state banks having many branches. This shows itself especially in the ability of the latter to secure savings deposits.

The convention of the A.B.A. adopted a resolution condemning the practice of branch banking.

by (unsigned) JOURNAL OF POLITICAL ECONOMY,
Aug., 1926, p. 544.

Mr. Collins gives ... a brief but clear treatment of the branch banking question as it has developed in the U.S. in the past few years. His 1st chapters deal with branch banking under state laws, and the number and distribution of statutory branches of national banks.

He then discusses the establishment of additional offices of natl. banks under the rulings announced by Comptroller Crissenger in 1922, later sustained by an opinion of Attny. General Daugherty. No mention is made of the establishment of additional offices in some states in which State banks are not allowed to open branches

Chief value is that it brings together the facts in current controversy in U.S. and summarizes them.

National versus state banks. (In: American Academy of Political & Social Science, The Annals, Jan.1934, p.17-34).

Our system of small, independent, irresponsible competitive banks, divided among 49 jurisdictions, is the epitome of what a banking structure should not be.

The power of Congress to unify commercial banking in a national system is assured.

In a series of four articles the author discusses credit extension in a branch system. Believes that in branch banking the limitation of each community should be based on the quality of its loan applications rather than on their volume in dollars.
