Outlines the gold exchange standard as employed in various countries. Concludes that it is only a name for a temporary stage in the transition from a silver to a pure gold standard. Attacks the position of those who consider that the value of the silver token money in a gold exchange standard country is determined by the quantity of such money in circulation.

The breakdown of the gold exchange standard and its financial imperialism. (In: Annalist, October 16, 1931, p. 626-27.)

The gold exchange standard is not a suitable plan for use among countries that are on the same competitive manufacturing or producing basis or between those which are comparable in size or significance.
