

The case of Scott v. Dewesse, 181 U.S. 202, did not involve any holding company, but was simply a case in which a shareholder who subscribed for stock in a bank, held the same in his own name and accepted dividends thereon, defended a suit to collect a stockholders' assessment on the ground that the stock had not been validly issued because the amount thereof had not been fully paid in cash as required by section 5142 of the Revised Statutes.
