My dear Marriner:

I might write you at very considerable length in reply to your letter of the 25th, but I agree with you that these are matters that cannot be very well settled by correspondence between two men who have as many other things to do as you and I have.

I would very much welcome an occasion on which we might sit down together, with nothing else on our minds, and talk the subject over. My guess is that there is not any great difference between us, except that we may be looking at specific matters from somewhat different points of view. Blending our points of view might help both of us.

I haven't yet read the document attached to your letter, but I shall do so at the earliest opportunity.

With very best personal regards, I am

Very truly yours,
Bill

P.S. After dictating the foregoing, I had a few minutes loose and read the memorandum attached to your letter. I suspect you haven't read it or you wouldn't have sent it to me. It seems to me it shoots about as far around the specific points of my letter as it were possible to do. When we have that time together with nothing else to do, we can go into that, too.

What do you say?
