Mr. Lichtenstein, Secretary of the Federal Advisory Council

At the request of Mr. Ransom, Mr. Williams stated briefly his views with respect to the outlook for business improvement.

There ensued a general discussion of the proposal to create regional banks to lend to small businesses, which subject had been discussed at the meeting of the Federal Advisory Council but in connection with which the Council had taken no action. The discussion turned on the points whether commercial banks were meeting all legitimate demands for loans, whether the unsatisfied demand was not for equity capital rather than loans which commercial banks ordinarily would make, and whether there was a gap in the financial machinery of the country for furnishing capital to business which could be filled by the proposed regional banks or perhaps some existing organization.

Mr. Ransom referred to his recent discussion with the members of a committee of the Reserve City Bankers Association with respect to the desirability of having member banks furnish the Board with a breakdown of their loan figures to show new loans made and loans renewed and inquired whether, if the Board should make such a request of the member banks, there would be opposition on the part of banks to furnishing the information and whether the information developed would be of value. The discussion disclosed a preponderance of opinion on the part of members of the Council that the banks would not object seriously to furnishing the information and that, while there might be some difficulty in getting the information in a way that would furnish comparable figures, it would be of value in determining the extent to which banks were meeting the demand for loans and perhaps the types of loans being applied for. Reference was made during the discussion to the studies and investigations which had been made in this field during recent years as well as to the industrial loan experience of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal reserve banks.

At the conclusion of the discussion the meeting adjourned.
