Washington, D. C., April 30, 1948.

The SECRETARY OF LABOR:

This edition of the Bureau's directory of trade-unions in the United States was prepared in response to the many requests received for up-to-date information concerning labor organizations. It lists all known national and international unions, various State labor bodies, and gives certain general information on the structure and activities of the American labor movement.

The directory was prepared in the Bureau's Division of Industrial Relations, Boris Stern, Chief, by Theodore W. Reedy and Richard Shoemaker under the supervision of Nelson M. Bortz.

Directory of Labor Unions in the United States

The Labor Movement Since World War II

Organized labor in the United States has continued to grow in the 3 years since the end of hostilities in Europe and in the Pacific. New unions have been formed and old unions strengthened, with total membership advancing to over 15,000,000. Postwar developments, both at home and abroad, have led to the widening of union functions and activities and the formation of new labor alignments for such specific purposes as political activity and international collaboration.

Labor's gains were not recorded without set-backs. Curtailment of employment in war plants, coupled with reduced "take home" pay due to a decline in weekly hours of work, led to an unprecedented wave of labor-management controversies in late 1945 and 1946. Attempts to pass new labor legislation failed in 1946 but culminated in the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, enacted into law June 23 over a presidential veto. Within the labor movement the two major groups, the AFL and the CIO, despite several attempts, failed to find a formula for organic unity or cooperative action.

Most unions launched intensive membership drives as wartime pressures subsided. In the spring of 1946, both the AFL and the CIO concentrated upon the South as a focal point of organizing activity. Employer opposition and unfavorable public opinion dampened but did not defeat the recruitment of new union members. By the autumn of 1947, AFL unions reported an aggregate membership increase in the South of approximately half a million. The CIO estimated its gains at 280,000.

Many of the larger unions, such as the United Automobile Workers (CIO), the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (AFL), and the International Association of Machinists (Ind.), reported substantial gains by 1948; the Teamsters, for example, announced a record total of 1,060,000 members in January 1948. The UAW-CIO, which experienced severe losses with the shut-down of war plants, had, by early 1948, again approached its wartime peak of about a million members. The largest of the "independent" or unaffiliated labor organizations, the Machinists, climbed to a new membership peak of approximately 625,000. Few unions, according to available reports, experienced more than temporary membership losses from 1945 to 1948.

Passage of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 stirred organized labor to renewed efforts in the field of political "education" and activity. Implementing its traditional policy of rewarding its friends and defeating its political foes, the American Federation of Labor at its annual convention in October 1947 established "Labor's League for Political Education." The Congress of Industrial Organizations revitalized its Political Action Committee, and the railroad unions created their own political league. Somewhat similar committees were likewise set up by several of the larger national and international unions.

On the international front, labor's wartime interest in foreign affairs found peacetime outlets. Representatives of American unions assisted the United States Military Government to reorganize shattered labor groups in the occupied countries. Food, clothing, and supplies were furnished by American workers to help relieve suffering and destitution. Almost unanimous support was accorded to the proposed European Recovery Program. Both the AFL and the CIO, by convention action in the autumn of 1947 and subsequently by appeals to workers and by testimony before Congressional committees, urged the passage of the Marshall Plan. Abroad, representatives of the AFL and the CIO joined in March 1948 with labor groups from western European countries in a significant conference to consider problems of relief and rehabilitation. In the Pacific, both the AFL and the CIO have assisted in the establishment of a democratic Japanese trade-union movement.

In the autumn of 1945 the CIO, together with the British Trades Union Congress, the Soviet labor unions, and labor organizations from 53 other countries formed the World Federation of Trade Unions. The American Federation of Labor did not participate, nor is it a member of the WFTU. In January 1948, the AFL, the Railway Labor Executives Association, and the International Association of Machinists joined with labor movements from a number of Latin American countries to establish the Inter-American Labor Confederation.

Number and Structure of Unions

As it exists today, organized labor in the United States is made up of autonomous national and international unions which, in turn, are composed of local organizations of workers in various crafts, trades, professions, and industries. Most of the national or international unions are affiliated with either the American Federation of Labor or the Congress of Industrial Organizations. A number of railroad and Government workers' unions as well as a few others, mostly small and restricted to certain geographical areas, have never become a part of a federated group. Several other unions have at various times belonged to either the AFL or CIO but have withdrawn or been expelled. All of these unaffiliated unions are commonly known as "independents."

The present Directory lists 197 national or international¹ unions, of which 105 are affiliated with the AFL and 37 with the CIO. The number of local unions chartered by parent or national unions is not known precisely but is estimated as between 60,000 and 70,000. Some national unions have very few local branches or chapters, while others have over a thousand and in a few instances more than twice that number (table 1). About half of the unions listed in the Directory have less than 100 locals each.

^a Although the exact number of locals is not available for all unions listed in this Directory, sufficient information exists to place each union within the indicated groups in this table.

In addition to the locals which are chartered by their respective parent organizations some local unions are directly affiliated with the AFL and are known as federal labor unions, or with the CIO and are known as local industrial unions. These directly affiliated locals are usually confined to trades and industries where no appropriate national union exists although, when a substantial number of workers are organized within the industry, a national union may be chartered.²

Unions are frequently classified as "craft" or "industrial." Very few American unions, however, now fall clearly within either of these two types. Many unions are better described as "amalgamated" or "multi-craft" because they include two or more skilled and semi-skilled groups. Other unions are better described as "semi-industrial" because, although they may include all production workers within an industry, they frequently exclude certain maintenance, technical, or clerical groups. Generally, most AFL unions tend towards the craft or multi-craft type (e. g., the International Plate Printers, Die Stampers and Engravers' Union, and the Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators and Paperhangers) while most CIO unions are more readily classified as industrial or semi-industrial (e. g., the United Steelworkers, the United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers, and the Transport Workers Union).

Both the AFL and the CIO also maintain city and State organizations with which their affiliated unions within the area are expected to join. At the beginning of 1948, the AFL had 795 city centrals and 50 State federations of labor, including Alaska and Puerto Rico. The CIO reported 243 city, county, and district councils and 39 State industrial councils. A listing of the State AFL and CIO groups, together with their officers, begins on p. 52.

Membership Characteristics and Size

Various unions define "union membership" differently. Some unions include as "members" only employed workers whose dues are not in arrears for more than a specified period of 1, 2, or 3 months. Other unions include retired or superannuated members, those temporarily unemployed, those in the armed services, and those who, for other reasons, may not be actively engaged in their trade or job. In some instances apprentices are included; in other instances they are not. Union membership is frequently reported on a "per capita" basis, by which is meant the actual number of members on which dues are remitted for a given period, either by a local to its parent union, or by the parent national or international to an affiliated body, such as the AFL or the CIO.

² Total membership in AFL federal labor unions was 244,513 in 1947. Some of these unions were organized into "councils" (e. g., railway patrolmen, aluminum workers, sugar workers, etc.). A listing of these AFL councils appears on p. 51.

The most comprehensive and historically continuous series of statistics on union membership are those regularly reported by the American Federation of Labor. This is a per capita membership, based upon "the actual per capita tax" remitted to the AFL by affiliated unions. These per capita payments may at times understate or overstate the actual number of members enrolled by a particular union, but, on the average, and over a long period of years, they constitute the most authentic measure of union membership.

In a strict sense, the membership data of the separate unions, especially if the unions belong to different federations, are neither precise nor comparable, and an estimate or total obtained by adding the data for the separate unions should not be regarded as an exact measurement of union strength for any given time or even any given year. Nevertheless, it is the only measure now available and it does reflect membership trends of organized labor over a period of years.

All membership figures cited for specific organizations in the Directory are from an official union source: (1) A statement by the union to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, or (2) a statement appearing in the union's journal or reports, or (3) the per capita figure appearing in the annual convention proceedings of the American Federation of Labor. Most of the data are for 1947 or 1948; in some instances a 1946 membership figure was the most recent available. The data should therefore not be construed or interpreted as official Government statistics.

At the beginning of 1948, membership in American trade-unions was estimated at approximately 15,600,000.³ Of this number, the American Federation of Labor reported per capita payments from its affiliates for about 7,200,000 members. The Congress of Industrial Organizations claimed 6,000,000 members. About two and a half million workers belonged to unions not affiliated with either the AFL or the CIO. This latter group includes the International Association of Machinists and the United Mine Workers, each with a claimed membership of 600,000 or slightly higher, the four railroad train and engine service brotherhoods with an aggregate strength of approximately 450,000, and the Communications Workers of America with over 160,000 members.

Approximately half of the 197 unions listed in the Directory had a membership of 10,000 to 100,000. Only about 1 union out of 5 had over 100,000 members while 1 out of every 3 had fewer than 10,000 members (table 2).

³ Many unions whose headquarters are in the United States also have locals outside the continental United States, primarily in Canada. Complete break-downs of membership, by countries, are not, however, available, and the data cited throughout the Directory include a union's total membership irrespective of where located. The Thirty-sixth Annual Report on Labour Organizations in Canada, published by the Canadian Department of Labour and covering the calendar year 1946, reported 573,258 Canadian workers as members of international unions whose principal offices are in the United States.

¹ Although exact membership data are not available for all unions listed in this Directory, sufficient information exists to place each union within the indicated groups in this table.

Total trade-union membership has risen steadily and increased more than fivefold since the depression low of approximately 2,900,000 in 1933 (see chart). Compared with the total adult population of the United States 21 years of age and over, the proportion of union members declined from slightly more than 8 percent in 1920 to 5 percent in 1930. Between 1930 and 1940, however, the proportion doubled, and currently it is estimated at 17 percent. Roughly, therefore, one out of every six persons aged 21 years or over is a member of a labor organization.

In relation to the Nation's total labor force about one out of every four workers now belongs to a union. Union members, however, comprise more than 40 percent of that portion of the labor force in which unions have concentrated their organizing efforts. This portion excludes agricultural workers, domestic help, the self-employed, and other smaller segments of the labor force which, at least until recently, were not susceptible to trade-union activities.

In some industries, such as steel, automobiles, printing, construction, mining, and transportation (rail, bus, and trucking), most workers are union members. Other industries, such as cotton textiles, foodstuffs, and services (laundries, hotels, restaurants), are only partly, and probably less than 50 percent, organized.

Frequency of Union Conventions and Publications

Normally the convention, composed of delegates representing the membership, is the highest policy-making body of a union. Of the 197 national and international unions surveyed, 57 schedule conventions annually and 73 biennially. Thirteen unions meet in convention every 3 years, 22 every 4 years, and 12 at 5-year intervals. In the case of seven unions, the scheduling of a convention is determined through a referendum vote of the membership. Thirteen unions indicated that they had no provision in their constitution with respect to the holding of a convention. Most of these latter organizations are small in size.

Considerably more than half (120) of all national and international unions have an official journal or publication which is issued monthly. Twelve unions issue their journal weekly, and an equal number issue their publications on a semimonthly basis. Only 23 unions which report the existence of an official publication indicated that it was issued less frequently than once a month. Thirty of the 197 national and international unions indicated that they did not have a regular official publication.

Major 1947 Affiliation Changes

Several significant changes in affiliation and structure of American labor unions have occurred since the issuance of the Bureau's 1947 Directory a year ago. The United Mine Workers of America withdrew from the AFL December 12, 1947, and reverted to independent or unaffiliated status after having been reaffiliated with the Federation for almost 2 years. The National Federation of Telephone Workers was formally dissolved in June 1947, with most of its affiliated group participating in the establishment of the Communications Workers of America. Like its predecessor, the CWA remained independent. In the same industry the CIO formed the Telephone Workers Organizing Committee.

The Post Office Mechanics and Maintenance Employees (Ind.) and the Post Office Custodial Employees (Ind.) joined forces to form the National Association of Post Office Mechanics and Custodial Employees (Ind.). The Inlandboatmen's Union of the Pacific withdrew from the CIO and joined the Seafarers' International Union (AFL). The Railroad Workers of America (CIO) affiliated with the Marine and Shipbuilding Workers of America (CIO). The American Federation of Hosiery Workers was expelled from the Textile Workers of America (CIO) in April 1948 and is listed as an unaffiliated union. The following month, the Federation of Dyers, Finishers, Printers and Bleachers of America (CIO), also a semi-autonomous affiliate of the Textile Workers Union of America (CIO) formally dissolved and became an integral part of the TWUA. The American Federation of Grain Millers (AFL) received a charter from the AFL in May 1948. This organization had previously been known as the American Federation of Grain Processors, a council of directly affiliated AFL federal labor unions.

Originally formed in 1881 as the Federation of Organized Trades and Labor Unions of the United States and Canada, the American Federation of Labor adopted its present name in 1886. In that year the Federation comprised 13 national and international unions with a total membership of approximately 150,000. Today the AFL has five major departments, 105 national and international unions and 50 State and Territorial branches. At the beginning of 1948 the membership of the AFL, based on per capita tax payments received from affiliated unions, was about 7,200,000.

The Committee for Industrial Organization (CIO) was formed in November 1935 to organize into unions all workers, irrespective of their skills, in certain mass production industries. The original committee was composed of 8 AFL unions. Differences between the AFL and its CIO-affiliated unions resulted in the latter's suspension and ultimate expulsion from the AFL. In 1938 the CIO adopted a constitution and its present name, the Congress of Industrial Organizations. The CIO currently has 37 national and international unions, 2 organizing committees, and 39 State branches and reports a membership of approximately 6,000,000 members.

National and International Unions

All national and international unions known to the Bureau of Labor Statistics are included. Each organization is listed alphabetically by the key word or words identifying the craft or industry within which the union operates and all information concerning the union will be found under this listing. For the convenience of those who are accustomed to referring to a union by its full official title (e. g., International Union United Automobile, Aircraft and Agricultural Implement Workers of America) a "finding list" appears in the back of the Directory.

For the first time since the publication of the Bureau's Handbook of Trade-Unions in 1936, each national and international union was specifically asked to provide information to the Bureau. The request included the union's correct title, address and affiliation; the name of its president and secretary-treasurer; its official publication, frequency of issue, and editor; the name of the directors of the research and education departments; and the frequency and date of its next convention. In an accompanying letter each union was also asked to indicate its membership in good standing and the number of constituent local unions.

Not all unions submitted information on their membership and number of locals, and wherever possible these data were then obtained from other union sources. For each union, the source of membership information is therefore noted as follows:

*Submitted by the union to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Data appearing in the union's journal or reports.

Per capita average annual membership as published in the convention proceedings of the American Federation of Labor.
