Preface

The manpower and educational legislation enacted during the last decade has continuously underscored the need for manpower planning and information on current and projected occupational requirements. To help guide educators and manpower planners, the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), in cooperation with the Manpower Administration, prepared Tomorrow's Manpower Needs, BLS Bulletin 1606. This four-volume report presented detailed national manpower projections by occupation and industry, together with a guide to their use in developing similar reports at the State and local levels. Since the procedures outlined require that local manpower analysts have the most recent and accurate national manpower information available, BLS has periodically revised and updated its data and refined its methods. The full series of publications is as follows:

Tomorrow's Manpower Needs:

Vol. I Developing Area Manpower Projections, Bulletin 1606 (1969).

Vol. II National Trends and Outlook: Industry Employment and Occupational Structure, Bulletin 1606 (1969).

Vol. III National Trends and Outlook: Occupational Employment, Bulletin 1606 (1969).

Introduction

The development of information on manpower requirements for States and areas has been related to occupational needs resulting from industrial expansion. However, as mentioned in Volume I of Tomorrow's Manpower Needs,¹ the number of openings from growth is insufficient for manpower planning, and replacement needs must also be taken into account.

Replacement needs, which occur when workers shift occupations, change localities, or leave the labor force, represent a significant portion of total openings. For example, table 1 shows that for the Nation as a whole, the number of openings from separations between 1972 and 1985 will be more than double the number created by growth. Unfortunately, data limitations prevent reliable information about the number of openings created when workers shift occupations or change localities even though limited research indicates that such needs are numerically significant.² Data from the 1970 Census are currently being examined to see if some light can be shed on this area of knowledge.³

Separation from the labor force may result from death, retirement, disability, or temporary withdrawal for personal reasons. However, these losses generally are referred to as deaths and retirements and the rate at which people leave the labor force is known as the "death and retirement rate." This report presents results of losses from separation and indicates how each State can estimate these losses.

Estimating occupational labor force separations

Employment requirements from separations can be calculated in several ways. A simple way is to determine the average working life of members of a particular occupation; in an example of 40 years, then $\frac{1}{40}$ or $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent should retire or die each year. This percentage would be valid if all workers at each age level were equal, as in an occupation which has not grown for 40 years and which had a steady influx of workers each year. The rate could be multiplied by the number of workers in the occupation to obtain the actual number who may be expected to leave the occupation each year.

Another method is to project deaths and retirements separately when deaths and retirements are the only type of separation. Appropriate mortality rates can be applied to total employment if the same age composition as the population in the country is assumed or if the age composition of the occupation is available. Retirements are estimated in each age interval of an occupation for the number of persons who will reach a predetermined or assumed retirement age at each period in the future, after allowance for deaths.

A more refined technique for estimating deaths and retirements is based on "tables of working life."⁴ These tables are statistical or actuarial devices for summarizing the mortality experience of the population at some particular period of time, i.e., the death rates, by age, over a one-year period. A life table starts with a hypothetical group of persons—usually 100,000 born alive—and follows the death rates of the real population at each age. Tables of working life also indicate labor force participation of the initial group of 100,000 from 16 years of age; it shows attrition caused by withdrawals from the labor force as well as by mortality. Tables of working life, which have been set up on an actuarial basis for both men and women, account for deaths and retirements (separately) at each age level.

Separations for men

In working life tables, all separations for men under 35 from the labor force are assumed to result from death because retirements are not significant in these ages. Therefore, the number of separations (deaths) can be found by subtracting the number of an original 100,000 males born alive who are still in the labor force in year $T + 1$ from those who were in the labor force in year T .⁵

In working life tables, separations for men 35 and over from the labor force include reasons other than death, such as retirement and disability. Therefore, the number still in the labor force in year $T + 1$ is subtracted from the number in the labor force in year T . Retirements equal net separations minus deaths.

Table 2 is an excerpt from the unpublished 1970 table of working life for males developed by the BLS. Column 2 contains accessions to the labor force at various age levels. Column 3 presents the combined rate which is called the "age-specific separation rate." The proportions who die and retire are in columns 4 and 5 respectively.

Separations for women

Although men usually remain in the labor force until retirement or death, women may withdraw temporarily because of marriage, children, or other family considerations. Many women who leave the labor force for such reasons, however, reenter after their children reach school age or after their husband's death. Therefore, temporary as well as permanent withdrawals or retirements must be considered in tables of working life for women.

Table 3 shows accession and separation rates for women in 1960. The 1960 rates are shown because 1960 was the last year for which a complete working life table for women was developed. Separation rates for women in 1970 and 1985, as shown in Table 6, were derived from corresponding values for 1960, as published in the Manpower Administration Report No. 12, Work Life Expectancy and Training Needs of Women, tables 3 and 4, respectively. This report should be consulted for information on concepts and methods employed in constructing the 1960 table.

Tables 4 and 5 illustrate the complex factors involved in developing age-specific separation rates for women. Partly because of child rearing and reentry into the labor force after child bearing, rates for women do not follow the general upward trend of rates for men.

The high rate of withdrawal from the labor force is shown in columns 3, 4, and 7 of table 4. The rates due to marriage (column 5) and birth of children (column 7) peak in the 20-24 year age group.

The high overall accession rates (column 3) in the 14-19 and 20-24 age groups are due to the original entry of some women into the labor force. Unfortunately, time lags in securing data have not allowed analysts to consider the aforementioned factors except in 1960.

Accessions to the labor force, shown in table 5, are high in the 30 to 44 year age groups due to women reentering when their children reach school age (column 7).

Table 6 shows estimates obtained when a working life table is developed for 1970 and 1985. All age-specific changes in rates of entry and separation which have been assumed between 1960 and any projected year are purely a function of changes in mortality and in corresponding age-specific rates of labor force participation. They do not entirely reflect changes in the relative proportions of women in different marital and child status categories although BLS is developing such information from 1970 data.

Determining occupational labor force separation rates

The preceding discussion has related to the development of age-specific separation rates. These rates are multiplied by the number of workers in an occupation for each respective age interval to obtain an estimate of the number of separations from the labor force for that occupation. This procedure is illustrated in table 7 and explained in the following paragraph.

Employment figures for men of every age interval (column 2) are multiplied by the male age-specific rates for the respective age intervals (column 3) to produce an estimate of the number of separations at each age interval (column 4). The numbers in column four are summed to obtain a total of male separations (168). The same procedure is followed to estimate separations for women (columns 5, 6, and 7). Separations for men (168) are added to separations for women (276) to get total separations (444). Once the number of labor force separations is known, the rate for each occupation can be computed. This procedure is illustrated from data in table 7.

Female	4,927	276	.0560

In summary, the separation rate from the labor force for an occupation is computed by applying the age-specific rates by sex to the number of the occupation in each respective age-sex interval. This gives the number of separations which, when divided by the occupational employment total, result in a labor force separation rate for the occupation.

Limitations of this method

Data limitations hinder the study of the labor force separation needs. The 1985 separation rates in this volume are based upon 1985 age-specific rates and 1970 Census occupational age distributions. One limitation of using the 1970 age distribution is the assumption that the age and sex distribution of the occupation will remain the same. The 1970 age distribution is used because the 1970 Census is the latest source of age distribution for detailed occupations, and there is no reliable method to effectively project occupational age distributions. Projections of the labor force age distributions can be made, but insufficient data on occupational mobility preclude the projecting of occupational age distributions.

Another limitation is the lack of working life tables by occupation. The same age-specific separation rates apply to age distributions as if mortality and retirement do not differ by occupation. The nature and environment of work, coverage and provisions of pension plans, opportunities for employment, and other factors influence retirement patterns and mortality trends among occupations.

The characteristics of marriage and presence of children are assumed to have the same effect on all women regardless of occupation. The more education women have the higher their labor participation rates and their concentration in certain occupations. Data are not available to account for these factors.

Separation rates for States

In the past, many States applied National separation rates to occupational employment. This technique assumes that mortality trends and retirement patterns in age-specific rates are the same in the State as in the Nation. This limitation is not major, but it is enough to affect State rates and some States may wish to develop their own age-specific rates and working life tables. Labor force separation rates for all States and the Nation are compared and published in BLS Bulletin 1769.

Data in table 8, BLS Bulletin 1769, show that separation rates varied significantly by State.⁶ The combined annual rate in the last column shows State rates vary from .0238 (Alaska) to .0335 (Nebraska). If the National rate (.0289) were used in Alaska or other States having a rate less than the National, separations would be overestimated more than 20 percent. If the National separation rate (.0289) were used in Nebraska or other States having a rate more than the National, separations would be underestimated.

⁶ These separation rates for a State were derived by applying National age-specific rates to State occupational age distributions. See table 7 for an example.

Table 9 shows the effect that rates have on separation estimates in the State rather than in the Nation.⁷ Columns 4 and 6 show separations that would occur in selected occupations if the Arkansas and United States rates, respectively, were applied to State totals. Column 7 shows Arkansas separations as a percent of U.S. separations. The use of the Arkansas rate resulted in 64 more separations for carpenters. There was a large difference between the number of bus driver separations resulting from the Arkansas rate (114) and those resulting from the United States rate (54).

Developing average annual separations

Estimates of the average number of separations each year over the projection period are very valuable for manpower analysts in combining openings from growth and replacements and comparing with occupational estimates. The suggested method for States is to apply the separation rate for the middle year of the projection period to the occupational employment at the midpoint of the projected period as follows:

Registered Nurses in Alaska
(occupation code 10100400 in Appendix A)

Year	Employment	Separation rate
1970	940	.0529
1985	1240*	.0547

*This hypothetical 1985 employment figure is used for explanatory purposes.

The theoretical middle year is 1977.5. The middle year separation rate can be estimated by taking the midpoint of the separation rates of the base year and the projected year.

$$\frac{1970 \text{ rate} + 1985 \text{ rate}}{2} = 1977.5 \text{ rate}$$

.0547 + .0529 = .1076. This .1076 is divided by 2 to arrive at the middle year rate. $.1076 \div 2 = .0538$.

The average annual separation rate is now known, but the employment for the middle year has to be interpolated to find the average annual number of separations.

$$\frac{1970 \text{ employment} + 1985 \text{ employment}}{2} = 1977.5 \text{ employment}$$

$$1977.5 \text{ employment} = 2180 \div 2 = 1090$$

The average annual separation rate (.0538) is multiplied by the average employment for the projected period (1090) to arrive at the estimate for the average annual number of separations during the projection period.

Average annual employment x average annual separation rate = annual separations

$$1090 \times .0538 = 59$$

Interim projection years

Interpolation should be used to estimate rates for years between 1970 and 1985, since working life tables are not available for these years. The example of registered nurses in Alaska will again be used.

To interpolate the 1980 rate, the number of years from the base year to the interim year (10) is divided by the number of years in the projection period (15) and then multiplied by the change in the rate from the base year to the projected year.

$$\frac{10}{15} \times .0018 = .0012$$

Since the rate is increasing from the base year to the projected year, the change is added to the base year to obtain the interim year rate.

$$\begin{aligned} \text{Base year rate} + \text{change} &= \text{Interim year rate} \\ .0529 + .0012 &= .0541 \end{aligned}$$

Appendix A. Labor force separation rates for men and women by occupation and State, 1970 and 1985

This appendix contains occupational separation rates for 1970 and 1985 for over 400 occupations by State. These rates are the combined rate of separation for the occupation. Separation rates by sex for over 400 occupations were developed for every State. Due to the tremendous volume of data involved, separation rates for men and women were not included in this report but they are available upon request from BLS regional offices.

The combined separation rates for the two years, 1970 and 1985, enable analysts to develop average annual separation rates and also to estimate interim year separations. (See text of this bulletin for methodology.) The 1970 rates in this appendix were developed using 1970 National age-specific rates and 1970 State occupational age distributions; the 1985 rates were derived by applying the 1985 age-specific separation rates to the 1970 age distributions. (See text on the limitations of these data.) Labor force separation rates which are very small or large occur because the State has little or no employment in the occupation.

Appendix B. U.S. labor force separation rates for men and women by occupation, 1970 and 1985

This appendix contains National occupational separation rates for total employment, by sex, for over 400 Census occupations. The first list contains rates obtained by applying the 1970 age-specific rates to the 1970 age distributions. The second list contains rates obtained by applying the 1985 age-specific rates to the 1970 age distribution. Caution should be used with these data due to the limitations expressed in the text.
