Leadership Means Management of Change

By WILLIS ALEXANDER Executive Vice President American Bankers Association Washington, D. C.

(Ed. Note: This article contains major excerpts from the author's address to the ABA convention in Chicago earlier this month.)

HE question for us is simple: are we as bankers adapting to the changes in our profession? Are we staying on top of the ferment and managing it in the interest of the communities and institutions we serve? Or are we merely reacting to each individual shock - in effect allowing change to manage us?

As we search for answers to these questions, it seems to me we should keep two basic facts in mind.

First of all, banking is a profitable business. I think most of us would agree that well-run banks generally do provide good earnings.

Second, we are fortunate that a sizeable segment of the public appears to be looking to bankers for leadership. The polls continue to show that the public has confidence in us as bankers and as community leaders.

I submit to you that the way to make our time a good time is by accepting the challenge implicit in change - the challenge of using all our skills and experience to make it work in the public interest. This won't be an easy task; in fact, it will be extremely complex.

I'm sure you're all aware that certain changes in the powers and structure of our financial system are now occurring. But viewed in perspective, these changes are but part of the ferment that pervades America today - a ferment that is making its impact felt on all aspects of society. For example, technological developments are altering the operational aspects of farming, retailing, manufacturing, and transportation, even as they are affecting banking.

The demographics of our population are changing, and that means the people components of the communities we serve are also being altered. On the whole, our customers today are younger, better educated, more affluent and certainly more mobile than ever before in the history of banking. Yet there are areas where the "over-65" segment with their special needs provides an expanding market.

Changes in the world's population and food supply have brought about the unexpected but welcome emergence of agriculture as a strong growth industry for the future. And finally, the public today seems to be demanding higher standards of performance from all institutions - including banking.

I don't think we can deny the challenge implicit in these changes - and I don't think we would want to. But as we take up this challenge, I sense that many of us are having to re-examine our traditional banking philosophy.

For more than a hundred years, American bankers have had two primary responsibilities: to preserve funds received from depositors, and to lend and invest those funds out in such a way as to benefit both the public interest of the community and the private interest of the depositor or

The question is: how will the challenge of managing change affect this traditional fiduciary-like philosophy? Will we be able to reconcile these responsibilities of trust with the bold thoughts and actions necessary for coping successfully with this era of accelerating change?

This question is certainly not made any easier by the ever-present realization that we are a regulated industry. And as such we cannot afford to forget a simple truth from

Does your present Extra Expense policy cover policy cover plood damage? riot? tornado?

Interstate National's All Risk coverage does. And more. And, premiums on Interstate's Bank All Risk Extra Expense coverage are comparable to those for policies that cover named perils only. Because the expense of reopening your bank immediately after a fire, riot or other disaster can be substantial, you need a good Extra Expense policy. One with no daily limit, or no limit on the first month's payout when your expenses are the greatest. A policy that pays immediately, so you can get back into operation immediately.

Your insurance agent has such a policy, along with a full range of Interstate bank and financial institutional coverages each geared to pay you extra dividends.

LEADERSHIP

recent economic history: industries which are over-regulated can easily lose their ability to adapt to changes in their environ-

Then, too, as a regulated industry, we are required to compete with non-regulated competitors, as well as with other regulated industries.

This does not mean that competition is a bad thing. Most thoughtful bankers would agree that competition, while not exactly comfortable, probably spurs us to provide more and better services for our customers. It helps to create a banking environment in which we work harder to attract, develop and retain the kind of people we need. And it offers an incentive for us to meet the growing number of financial needs expressed by the American public.

We accept, then, the facts that our customers look to us for leadership and that change is occurring — and in exercising that leadership we accept the necessity of managing that change.

More broadly, we accept the leadership responsibility of managing change in working with other community and government leaders to resolve the pressing social problems that plague our nation problems such as the death of the inner city, racial prejudice, housing shortages, deterioration of our environment, the energy crisis, the transformation of rural America — the list is almost endless.

More important, we accept the leadership responsibility of managing change in the public interest by working with others to develop new and more effective approaches to the management of our economy. This is an awesome list - and it is by no means complete.

Banking in this country has experienced a certain measure of success. We do have a reasonable margin of profit. We have the confidence of the American public that we can and should help solve some of the problems that threaten our society. And so I ask you today: will we use our success as a base from which we seek in the public interest to manage the changes that are already taking place in our world? I submit that the banking industry cannot afford to

In a world where change is rapidly becoming the only constant, it's difficult to make sure we are in fact making the right decision. I think there may be a clue to the solution of this dilemma. If we take care to measure our decisions against the benchmark of public interest — if we make the interest of our customers and our communities our primary concern - then our performance over the next few years cannot fail to be a success. Our success in the past will have provided the base for success in the future. Ours will not have been the failure of success. Indeed, as Emerson said, our time will be judged a good time, because we knew what to do with it.
